I deployed the application on tomcat and it works well. I was trying to add a vote functionality to the article table. So I modified the article entity(while hibernate was not working) to add a new method to get the number of votes. I then added some code in articleController.java to retrieve the votes from database. I could not add a getter method to the article because whenever I tried to create/update/delete an object(article class) I got the following exception. I could not hibernate the project. As I began releasing the prototype to the world, I started to hear that things were a bit fragile. Specifically, I was having to shove configuration into the module at install time. (Most modules leave this blank. Either you use their defaults or you pass in your own options.) This got me thinking and
