Matching effects of a money illusion, a perceptual bias, and a cognitive bias in lay decision making. In Experiment 1, people chose a safe, sure, or risky gamble after being presented with a choice between two risky gambles of equal expected value. The safe gamble offered a higher return with a lower variance of wins and losses than either risky gamble, but people chose the risky gamble over the safe gamble regardless of the level of uncertainty. However, having visualized two different types of risky gambles displayed side-by-side (high-uncertainty-high [HUH] and low-uncertainty-high [LUH]) enabled people to infer the level of uncertainty associated with each gamble and select the gamble with the higher expected value. However, people selected the HUH gamble even when the stakes and probabilities matched those of the LUH gamble. In Experiment 2, subjects' perceptions of win probabilities were manipulated by providing false information about the variance of wins and losses associated with risky gambles. In one condition, subjects believed that high-return-low-variance gambles were more risky than low-return-high-variance gambles, but in the other condition subjects believed that low-return-high-variance gambles were more risky than high-return-low-variance gambles. When subjects believed that high-uncertainty gambles were more risky than low-uncertainty gambles, they selected safer, but risky, gambles over unsafe, but sure, gambles. Finally, in Experiment 3, subjects' perceptions of risk were manipulated by presenting subjects with gambles where the variance of wins and losses was either known or unknown. Unbeknownst to the subjects, the variance was actually manipulated. Subjects selected safe gambles over risky gambles when the gamble was known to have higher variance. However, when the variance was unknown, subjects were less selective and selected both safe and risky gambles, irrespective of whether they believed that they should have selected safe or risky gambles. Overall, the results are consistent with the idea that people's decisions are influenced by both a money illusion (false sensory evidence about the value of the payoffs) and a perceptual bias (false sensory evidence about the level of uncertainty of the gamble). In addition, the results suggest that the valuation of safer, sure gambles is driven both by the value of these gambles and by a perceptual bias in which people believe that safer gambles are safer. - 6
