When it comes to edible insects that are growing in popularity for their delicious taste and nutritional value, worms are not usually on the first list of options. But that's no longer the case. The grocery store where I shop is filled with shelves stocked with products touting the many ways to enjoy the tasty morsels of the vegetable kingdom, from snack-size bags of toasted crickets to small jars of frankenworm (yes, it's technically named after its two favorite foods, sausage and eggs). Much of the worm appeal comes from the fact that these little critters are naturally high in protein and easily digestible, and while they're not likely to replace farmed animals as a protein source, they can still be very helpful in terms of dietary variety. But lately I've been thinking about something else: how worms might affect the worm Tinnitus can be life-altering and debilitating. Many people with tinnitus find relief by wearing a hearing aid or a device to mask the noise; however, one of the challenges with using these devices is the unpleasantness of the masking. A researcher set out to identify alternative nonsurgical masking devices to test the efficacy of such a device on tinnitus relief. This study describes a clinical evaluation of a self-masking tinnitus device (SMTD). The SMTD was compared with hearing aids on phantom sound awareness (PSA) and tinnitus distress scores (TDS) in adults with tinnitus, tinnitus severity, and hearing loss. Randomized controlled prospective clinical trial. Tinnitus Clinic and Audiology Center of the University of Utah. Study population of 20 adult outpatients with tinnitus. Use of the SMTD. Mann-Whitney U test. In the SMTD group, 10/20 (50%) reported some relief of tinnitus with a median TDS reduction of 50% (P
