Charlton Libraries Push Google eBooks and Digital Content The library also began digitizing its manuscripts, archives and university publications. Charlton Libraries is ready to roll out Google's eBooks and eContent programs, which are designed to make the reading and borrowing of electronic books and other digital media easier. The San Diego, Calif.-based national nonprofit, which serves public library systems in 16 states and is called Library Journal's "Most Innovative Library" for the second year in a row, will begin offering the services of both Google.org and Google's Nexus 7 tablet to its constituents this week. "The digital divide is huge, and libraries are poised to drive new books, research and other digital content available for free to the public," said Lynn Marriott, vice president of business development and marketing at Charlton. "With the launch of our Google eBooks and eContent Services, we're showing San Diegans and our other constituents the incredible benefits of eBooks and digital content." In November, Library Journal named Charlton the second most innovative library in the country after the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign's library. The Charlton Libraries were among the first public libraries in the country to offer free Wi-Fi and eContent services, and the Library Journal named Charlton the "Most Innovative Library" a second consecutive year. Google is partnering with libraries to make a library's collection of books, journals, newspapers and magazines available online via the company's Google Books and Google eBooks digital tools. The libraries are also serving as marketing, education and technology test sites for the tablet computer, Nexus 7, that Google is also making available
