The two key issues are the huge number of alignments required for accurate calculation of the matrix and, especially for homology detection, the experimental difficulties to find enough (not too few) of them. Both problems can be tackled by going to higher, but more expensive, alignments, for instance RMSD or SSE alignments, but then the accuracies are typically poorer. These problems have been extensively addressed in the last decade by means of cross-validation experiments and a Bayesian statistical criterion such as the one used here, that gives a more reliable indication of the outliers, i.e. those best alignments that did not match with the data at all. It is well known that profile-profile comparisons have the great advantage of allowing the use of powerful distance measures such as RMSD that can handle the lack of translation symmetry in the structures and which could be used to propose an important hypothesis of the phylogeny of sequences. We have seen in section 3 that a subset of alignments was already compatible with a reasonable phylogenetic hypothesis. This result gives an independent confirmation of the approach. Moreover, the statistic proposed here is not only necessary but also powerful. On the contrary, it would be meaningless to have homology criteria under the null hypothesis of random phylogeny. This paper is a first step towards automatizing the use of a large number of alignments in phylogenetics. The test of statistical significance is relatively easy to implement as it relies only on standard statistical test and is not dependent on a specific programming language. A next step in that direction would be to try to use other criteria than RMSD to compare two alignments in order to select the best ones for a given query sequence or to provide alignments with a better statistical support for a given phylogenetic hypothesis, from one such statistic.
