The human thyroid secretory granule proteoglycan core protein (TGP-I) has been partially purified from Graves' thyroid tissue. The structure of the core protein was determined by using peptide mapping in conjunction with amino acid composition analysis. The purified TGP-I core protein was found to be a homodimer of two subunits of about 400,000 Da. Peptide mapping showed that it is similar, but not identical, to the covalent subunits of the mucin core protein. The amino acid composition of TGP-I core protein is distinctive compared with the protein backbone of mucin and Thy-1 cell surface glycoprotein and with other granule components. The core protein has a relatively low level of tyrosine and tryptophan and has a high content of glutamic acid, aspartic acid, and proline. The primary structure of TGP-I core protein suggests that it has structural characteristics of a mucin-type proteoglycan core protein. Because of its very low level of tyrosine and tryptophan, however, TGP-I differs from all known glycosaminoglycans.Combined Proton Radiation Therapy and Photodynamic Therapy. Proton radiation therapy (PRT) is now considered as an alternative to electron radiation therapy in the treatment of cancer because
