Challenging the canonical dogma: creatine kinase-creatine reaction does not depend on hydrated electrons. There is a widespread belief that creatine kinase-creatine is a two-electron reaction involving the reduction of creatine to creatine phosphate. Nevertheless, the enzyme catalytic efficiency, as determined by steady-state kinetics, is virtually independent of creatine concentration, and kinetic isotope effect measurements support a direct two-electron mechanism. Furthermore, computational studies suggest that the two-electron mechanism can be accomplished by a reductive single-step process initiated by electron transfer from the solvent to the nucleophile. Additional studies in which the EPR signal of hydrated electrons is replaced by a paramagnetic substrate radical and the lifetime of the EPR-detectable charge-transfer intermediate is measured, provide additional evidence for this mechanism. Finally, simulations of the electronic absorption spectrum are in agreement with the predicted molar absorption coefficient of the charge-transfer state of 10(10 6d1f23a050
